DEAR DIANE

by Diane Van Arsdale

DEAR DIANE:

I'm 23 years old, and have been dating the same man for the past three years. I love him as a person, and most importantly, as a friend. We plan on getting married in the near future. Since we've been together, I've never even looked at another guy, until recently. This other person is one of my boyfriend's best friends. I've known him ever since I started dating my boyfriend. These past years, we've been nothing but friends. Then last year, he (our friend) left for the Navy. Well, needless to say, I started missing him very much. Every time he comes down, the attraction between us grows much stronger. We write to one another when he isn't home, and I think that contributes to our feelings as well. We are both responsible adults, and we don't want to hurt my boyfriend and his friend. We respect one another, and have decided to lock these feelings away and close the book on this chapter altogether. He was just down about two weeks ago, and he spent most of his time with another girl. I felt so jealous and hurt, I ever want to lose him as a friend, or break up the friendship he and my boyfriend have. I would never jeopardize losing either one. Please help to stop these feelings before I do hurt all of us. Thanks.

TEMPTED

DEAR TEMPTED:

I think there are a number of things going on here. For starters, I don't think you're at all ready to get married. I think you value your friendship with your boyfriend, but, perhaps, you don't love him in the "marriage" sense of the word. Because of that, and because you're not yet ready to face that reality, you've romanticized the friendship with the other man. That's fine, because that alone should give you reason to rethink your decision to marry your boyfriend. You say you don't want to hurt anyone, but, believe me, you'll be hurting everyone a lot worse by going through with a marriage which shouldn't happen in the first place.

I suggest you reduce things to a more casual level with your boyfriend. Go out with other people. However, do avoid the other man. That situation is trouble, and I don't really believe there's a true feeling there. It's being influenced by other factors.

DEAR DEX

by Dexter Dyer

DEAR DEX:

I've been with my girlfriend for two years, and I think I'm in love. I'm 26, and she's 24. When we're together, we always have a good time no matter what we're doing. But she has a tendency to stray when we're in public places with friends. She always seems to be playing games with other men, teasing them. Although she does this, she said she truly loves me and wants me. I have always believed that, and love her so much that I let certain things go, and forgive her. She has strayed a few times over the past two years with other men, but begged to have me back afterward, and I always gave in, even when I knew I shouldn't have. I can't seem to stay mad at her. She said the other men don't mean anything to her. I've been faithful to her and expect the same in return, especially in the '90s when there are so many diseases, and of course, the AIDS virus. Do you have any advice on how I can work things out with my girlfriend? I would truly appreciate it.

STYMIED

DEAR STYMIED:

I think your girlfriend has some self-esteem problems. That's why she feels it necessary to flirt with other men, and why she needs to sleep with them. It's my guess that when these men pay attention to her, it reaffirms some sort of confidence in herself that she's lacking. If she were a secure woman in her own right, and she was comfortable with herself and her sexual image, she wouldn't have the need to draw other men to her at all.

I can tell from your letter that you really genuinely care for this woman. That's why I think you should suggest she get counseling for her problems. As you've pointed out, this isn't a harmless game she's playing. It's quite dangerous, and your welfare is just as much at stake as hers.

If, for some reason, she's against counseling, perhaps you can get her to go with you. She may feel less threatened if you're with her. Good luck.

Home hints

HEARY HINT — If there is an elderly, incapacitated or young person in your home you have at a loss for something of interest, I have a sure-fire, tested solution: an out door bird bath. It is not a continued expense as in a bird feeder, but it is loved as dearly by our feathered friends.

Place the bird bath near a large window where one can sit and watch the bird bath from inside the home. Note: If you purchase a plastic bird bath, fill the base with water and set atomic for more stability.

Even nursing homes could place bird baths in the view of sitting room windows and give pleasure to both birds and residents. Georgia W. Flushing, N.Y.

SODA BOTTLES — The plastic bottoms on one- and two-liter soda bottles can be recycled into several different and useful things. After removing them from the bottles, I have used them for flower pots and knickknack bowls, and when lined with aluminum foil, they make great outside ashtrays. Harry T. Annandale, Va.

RECYCLING HINT — I thought I would send you this recycling hint. With a family of five children, I've been doing this for years. I cut out the fronts and the backs of empty cereal boxes. Then I cut each panel into three sections.

I find that these are nice for notes, grocery lists or simply a writing pad for telephone messages. Jenny V. San Antonio, Texas
